Passage 1

Questions 11-15 are based on the following passage.

A new study shows that sound is an important, yet often undervalued part of how skateboarders connect with the activity. Skateboarders not only see their environment but also feel and hear it. Photos and videos may show the amazing moves, but they don't express the whole experience.

The sounds from the city surfaces — the "skate sound" — are a key part of the skateboarding experience. These sounds enable skateboarders to check the success of their moves, test if surfaces are suitable for skating, and send messages to others around them.

However, the study introduces an interesting idea — the "skate sound paradox（矛盾）". Skateboarders are aware of the troubling nature of the noise they produce and change their behavior accordingly in certain situations to make less noise. Skateboarders describe the sound of the sport as both unpleasant and pleasant.

Researchers from the University of Exeter carried out interviews with 58 adult skateboarders aged between 19 and 51 from different places and experience levels. They found that the skate sound made people feel included, especially those who might feel left out of more traditional and regular sports. Interestingly, most skateboarders were against the idea of listening to music through headphones while skateboarding, viewing it as unfriendly. The sport is considered a social activity, and wearing headphones breaks the connection with the group and the overall experience.

However, those who chose to listen to music through headphones while skateboarding had their reasons. Music helped with focus for some skateboarders, while headphones served as a social barrier（障碍）for others, offering them more confidence.

The study shows that the skateboard is not just a toy or sports object but an "ear under the feet". Next time you hear the sounds of wheels and the board hitting the ground, think about what skateboarders are listening to. They're not simply making noise. Skateboarders are learning through their senses, connecting with their friends, and perhaps, finding unusual peace in a noisy world.

Passage 2

Questions 16-20 are based on the following passage.

The concept of minimalism has become increasingly popular in modern society, especially among young people who are tired of the busy and cluttered life caused by over-consumption. Minimalism is not just about throwing away useless things; it is a lifestyle that focuses on what is truly important, cutting out the unnecessary to make room for meaningful experiences, relationships and personal growth.

At its core, minimalism encourages people to reduce their material possessions to the bare essentials. This means getting rid of clothes that are never worn, furniture that takes up too much space, and electronic devices that are no longer used. The goal is not to live a life of poverty, but to free oneself from the burden of owning too much. Studies have shown that people who practice minimalism often report lower levels of stress and higher levels of happiness, as they spend less time worrying about material things and more time on activities that bring them joy.

Minimalism also extends beyond physical possessions to other aspects of life. It can mean simplifying one's schedule by saying no to unimportant social events or work tasks, or reducing screen time to spend more time in the real world. It can also involve simplifying one's diet, choosing healthy and simple foods over processed and complicated meals. In every case, the key is to ask oneself: does this add value to my life? If the answer is no, it is time to let it go.

One common misunderstanding of minimalism is that it is a boring and restrictive lifestyle. In fact, the opposite is true. By removing the unnecessary, minimalism gives people the freedom to focus on what they really care about. A minimalist may have more time to travel, learn a new skill, or spend quality time with family and friends. They may also have more financial freedom, as they spend less money on material goods and save for experiences that truly matter.

In a world that constantly encourages people to buy more and do more, minimalism is a refreshing change. It reminds us that happiness does not come from what we own, but from how we live our lives. It is a choice to live a more intentional, meaningful and fulfilling life.

16. What is the core idea of minimalism according to the passage?

A. Living a life of poverty with few material possessions.

B. Focusing on meaningful things by cutting out the unnecessary.

C. Throwing away all physical possessions and living simply.

D. Reducing screen time and spending more time in the real world.

17. Why do minimalists usually feel happier and less stressed?

A. They have more material goods to meet their needs.

B. They spend less time on meaningless things and more on joyful activities.

C. They don't need to work or take part in social events.

D. They live a boring life without any troubles.

18. Which of the following is NOT a form of minimalism in life?

A. Getting rid of unused electronic devices.

B. Saying yes to all social events to make more friends.

C. Reducing screen time to communicate with family face to face.

D. Choosing simple and healthy foods instead of processed meals.

19. What is the common misunderstanding of minimalism?

A. It is a lifestyle that brings more financial freedom.

B. It helps people focus on what they really care about.

C. It is a boring and restrictive way of living.

D. It is a popular trend among young people.

20. What can we infer from the last paragraph?

A. Modern society encourages people to practice minimalism.

B. Material possessions are the key to happiness in life.

C. Minimalism helps people live a more intentional and meaningful life.

D. People can only find happiness through traveling and learning new skills.

Traveling alone is a unique and meaningful experience that more and more people are choosing to have in recent years. Unlike traveling with friends or family, traveling alone allows you to be fully___31___with your own thoughts and feelings, and to make choices completely based on your own wishes and interests. It is a chance to challenge yourself, step out of your comfort zone, and learn more about yourself and the world.

When you travel alone, you have the___32___to plan your trip exactly how you want. You can stay in a place that you love for as long as you like, or leave a place that you don't enjoy without having to___33___anyone else. You can choose to eat at a local street food stall or a fancy restaurant, to hike a mountain or to relax on a beach—everything is up to you. This freedom is one of the greatest___34___of traveling alone.

Traveling alone also helps you develop independence and problem-solving skills. When you are on your own, you have to___35___all the problems and challenges that come your way, such as missing a bus, getting lost in a new city, or dealing with a broken hotel room. You have to learn to rely on yourself and find solutions by yourself, which makes you more___36___and confident.

Another great benefit of traveling alone is that it is easier to meet new people and make friends. When you are with a group of friends, you may be less likely to talk to strangers. But when you are alone, you are more open to___37___with local people and other travelers. You may meet a fellow traveler at a hostel, a local resident at a market, or a tour guide who can tell you interesting stories about the place. These chance___38___can make your trip more colorful and memorable, and you may even make lifelong friends.

Of course, traveling alone also has some___39___. It can be a little scary, especially for first-time solo travelers, to be in a strange place by yourself. But with time and practice, you will get used to it and even enjoy it.

Traveling alone is not for everyone, but it is an experience___40___everyone should try at least once in their life. It will challenge you, teach you, and change you in ways you never expected.
