Passage1

Questions16--20 are based on the following passage.

A simple flower made headlines in the British press last week. How could that be?

British Prime Minister David Cameron and his ministers were attending a reception hosted by Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao in the Great Hall of the People in Beijing. They insisted on wearing poppies(罂粟花) in their buttonholes.

What's wrong with that?

According to the Global Times, Chinese officials apparently had asked the UK delegation（代表团）not to wear poppies. The British said that poppies meant a great deal to them on that day and they would wear them all the same.

So what's the significance of the poppy? It's a flower which has different cultural and symbolic meanings for British and Chinese people.

From the Chinese point of view, the poppy is a symbol of China's humiliation at the hands of European powers in the Opium Wars（鸦片战争）of the 19th century. Britain forced China to open the borders to trade – including in the opium – which was made from poppies grown in India.

Yet from the British viewpoint, the poppy is a reminder of the killing during World War I. Red poppies grew on the battlefields of Flanders in Belgium where many thousands of British soldiers died or were buried. Since then, Poppy Day (November 11) has become a time in the UK to wear poppies and remember the sacrifices of British soldiers and civilians in times of war.

So you can see that the poppy sets off strong feelings in the hearts of Chinese and British people for different reasons. And it makes sense for us to try to understand each other's standpoint.

Of course cultural differences can also be interesting and funny. And what one nation thinks is an acceptable gift may be viewed differently by their guests from overseas. US President Barack Obama gave a gift of an iPod to Britain's Queen – a dull person with no interest in music. Obama also presented Gordon Brown with a fine selection of American movies. But they were in US format and impossible to play on British DVD players.

Many countries have diplomats stationed overseas. Diplomats provide information and advice to their governments back home. However, sometimes it would seem that even diplomats can overlook the cultural significance of a small flower.

11. British Prime Minister David Cameron probably attended a reception in Beijing on_____.

A. October 1　　B. November 11

C. December 31　　D. January 11

12. The poppy reminds the Chinese of _____.

A. the shame caused by European countries in the 19th century

B. the British soldiers who were killed and buried during World War I

C. the Chinese soldiers killed during World War II

D. the suffering caused by Britain during World War I

13. The diplomatic problem in Beijing is mainly caused by _____.

A. the translation mistake　　B. the language difference

C. the cultural difference　　D. the different lifestyle

14. We can infer that _____.

A. Britain's Queen is not interested in art

B. Gordon Brown was fond of American movies US President Barack Obama sent him

C. US President Barack Obama received a gift for music

D. Britain's Queen may not like the iPod US President Obama presented her

15. What is the main idea of the 9th paragraph?

A. Cultural differences can also be interesting and funny.

B. Cultural differences can cause a big problem.

C. US President Barack Obama likes to present gifts to other leaders.

D. US leaders and British leaders get along well with each other.

Passage2

Questions21-25 are based on the following passage.

How much electricity do you use? These days everyone is worried about the size of their carbon footprint（碳排放量）. In order to reduce global warming we need to make our carbon footprints smaller. But how much CO_2 are we responsible for?

A new book by Mike Berners Lee（a leading expert in carbon footprint）might be able to help. The Carbon Footprint of Everything looks at the different things we do and buy, and calculates the amount of CO_2 all of the following created: the ingredients（原料）, the electricity used in the brewery, the equipment, the travel and commuting of the beer, and the packaging. It's amazing how many different things need to be included in each calculation. And it's frightening how much carbon dioxide everything produces.

But all of this can help us decide which beer to drink. From Berners-Lee's calculations, it's clear that a pint（568ml）of locally-brewed beer has a smaller carbon footprint than a bottle of imported beer. This is because the imported beer has been transported from far away, and it uses more packaging. The local beer only produces 300g of CO_2, but the imported beer produces 900g! So, one pint of local beer is better for the environment than three cans of cheap foreign lager from the supermarket.

Berners-Lee has even calculated the carbon footprint of cycling to work. Nothing is more environmentally-friendly than riding a bike, surely? Well, it depends on what you've had to eat before. To ride a bike we need energy and for energy we need food. So if we eat a banana and then ride a kilometer and a half, our footprint is 65g of CO_2.However, if we eat bacon before the bike ride, it's 200g. In fact, bananas are good in general because they don't need packaging, they can be transported by boat and they grow in natural sunlight.

So, does this mean that cycling is bad for the environment? Absolutely not, for a start, if you cycle, you don't use your car, and the fewer cars on the road, the fewer traffic jams. And cars in traffic jams produce three times more CO_2 than cars traveling at speed. Cycling also makes you healthy and less likely to go to a hospital. And hospitals have very big carbon footprints!

So maybe it's time for us all to start making some changes. Pass me a banana and a pint of local beer, please.

16. The underlined word "brewery" in Paragraph 3 most probably means "_____".
   A. a factory where beer is made
   B. a machine which makes beer
   C. a container where beer is stored
   D. one of the things from which beer is made
17. Why are bananas good in general?
   A. They don't need packaging.
   B. They provide energy for cycling.
   C. They produces less CO2.
   D. They grow naturally.
18. According to Berners-Lee, which of the following produces the most carbon dioxide?
   A. A pint of local beer we drink.
   B. A pint of imported beer we drink.
   C. A banana we eat before a bike ride.
   D. The bacon we eat before a bike ride.
19. To make our carbon footprints smaller, we should often _____.
   A. cycle to work
   B. drink more local beer
   C. calculate the amount of CO_2
   D. buy cheap things from the supermarkets
20. What's the most suitable title for the passage?
   A. Bikes, Beer and Bananas
   B. Starting to Make Changes
   C. How Big Is Your Carbon Footprint?
   D. The Carbon Footprint of Everything
